1957 PREFACE

This Chinese-American Calendar has been prepared for use by officers of the Immigration and Naturalization Service. However, others who have dealings with Chinese may also find it helpful. It covers the fifty Chinese years beginning February 6, 1951, and ending January 23, 2001, a period for which there is no other Chinese-American Calendar of convenient size and suitable arrangement. There is a separate page for each Chinese year, and a separate column of black figures for each Chinese month. The red figures show the corresponding dates by our Gregorian calendar.

The present official calendar of China is the same as our own with the exception that the year we call 1912 is designated as the first year of the era of the Chinese Republic, 1913 as the second year of that era, and so on, and that the months are numbered instead of named. However, this method of reckoning time has not yet become popular in China, and, so far as I am aware, has not been applied to the period preceding its adoption. The vast majority of the Chinese people still follow the lunisolar calendar which, with some variations, has been in use among them since the earliest times.

During the period of the Empire the common method of designating the years was to regard the reign of each Emperor as constituting an era by itself, and numbering the years as the first, second, third, etc., of his reign. The era became that of the Chinese Republic when the Empire was overthrown.

The day is now recognized as beginning at midnight, and this has been the practice for a number of centuries, though the Chinese did not originally consider the day as beginning at that time.

The date of the astronomical new moon, even though its occurrence be barely before midnight by local time at Peking, China, is always the first day of a month.

The Chinese year commences with the day on which occurs the second new moon after the day of the winter solstice, and, therefore, cannot begin earlier than January 20 nor later than February 20.

Individual months vary a few hours in length, but average 29.530588 days. Therefore, Chinese calendar months, being regulated by the moon, are never more than 30 days in length and nearly half of them but 29. From this it will be seen that every two or three years, or, to be more exact, about 7 times in every 19 years, or, still more exactly, 22 times in 60 years, an extra month must be inserted in order that all calendar years shall begin during the specified period. Furthermore, these extra months cannot be inserted at the same place in different years for the reason that this would nullify the requirement that the vernal equinox must occur in the second month, the summer solstice in the fifth, the autumnal equinox in the eighth, and the winter solstice in the eleventh. Such an extra month is intercalary and may be inserted after any month of the year with the exception of the first, eleventh, and twelfth, being always considered as the second month of the same number as that which precedes it. Which month shall be intercalary is determined by the rule already mentioned concerning the times of the occurrences of the equinoxes and solstices and by the further provision that the intercalary month shall be one in which the sun enters no sign of the zodiac.

In the seventeenth century an official Chinese calendar, known as the Wan Nien Shu, based on these principles and covering the period of 397 years from 1624 to 2020, was prepared. However, an accurate Chinese calendar cannot be produced by copying from this without changes other than those due to a different arrangement; for the Wan Nien Shu contained some errors due to mistakes in computation or to the use of tables which have since been shown not to be sufficiently accurate. During the time of the Empire, many of these errors were corrected in the official almanac published each year by the astronomical board of the Chinese Government, such corrections being made less than a year before the beginning of the year affected. Whether or not the astronomical board has continued to do this since the establishment of the Republic and the official adoption of another calendar, I am not certain; but I do know that calendars published in China for years since the establishment of the Republic have not always agreed in cases where the Wan Nien Shu contained errors.

In preparing this calendar, I computed the Peking, China time of every conjunction, and determined which months were intercalary according to the rule already stated.
